

A one-man business races against complexity

When Kyle Connery was a professional car racer, he was building his own simulators — which were good enough to catch the attention of other racers. In 2015, he decided to turn it into a business, and now designs, fabricates and services simulators for some of the most elite drivers in American motorsports. Though KCR Simulators is currently a one-man operation, Kyle doesn't plan on working alone for long.

A knock-out punch of complexity

I'm the sole employee of my company, so at first, I thought, why do I need a payroll company? The last thing I wanted was to take on extra costs I didn't need. At the time, I was essentially classified as a 1099, so I would just cut myself a check every few weeks.

But it was frustrating at the end of the year, when the taxes I owed were different than the number I had in mind. And it was hard to keep track of my hours that way. I was getting a knock-out punch of complexity that I didn't need.

A breath of fresh air

When I sat down with the ADP representative, she showed me how I could go in through the mobile app, type in my hours, type in the hourly rate and pay myself as a full-time employee of my business. It gets automatically deposited — I don't have to go to the bank or anything. I also don't have to be in the office, filling out these massive forms, because the system is all automated. That, to me, was a breath of fresh air. And it was all very affordable for the services I was getting.

I'm using ADP's retirement service now, too, which is just as easy as the payroll app. I don't pay myself very much, but when the funds are aligned, it's easy to just do it. And at the end of the year, ADP generates my Form-W2 without me having to really do anything. I can easily generate a report that gets handed to my accountant, which makes her life easier.

ADP is an absolute must

As a single businessman, time is of the essence. If something is wrong or puts me behind schedule, it becomes a nuisance. But the ADP software is so easy to use. What I'm spending pales in comparison to the time I would waste tracking my own hours and taxes. If ADP gives me even a half-hour to spend on something that could make me more money, then it's a no-brainer.

I can see now that as I grow, ADP will make it easy to add employees. I won't have to go through some long, dragged-out process. All around, ADP has been a huge boost for me.

If you are working alone, and you value your time, ADP is an absolute must. Had I known, I would have done it sooner.
